

The golden eagle is in demand

Europeans are increasingly buying gold bars and coins. The background to this is asset protection.

Experts expect demand for physical gold to remain high in the course of 2023. Even weakening inflation should not change this. In the USA, too, coins and bars are selling like hot cakes. For example, the U. S. Mint sold 215,000 ounces of gold in the form of Eagle gold coins in March. That's the most in about two years, and compared to the same month last year, it's four and a half times as much. And here's another impressive number: compared to February 2023, March sales were up 347 percent. In terms of Eagle silver coins sold by the U. S. Mint, about 900,000 were sold in March, just as they were in February. However, a shortage of silver blanks likely played a role.

We will not know until the end of the year whether the central banks will again buy a record amount of gold this year as they did in 2022. However, industry insiders expect that central banks will again eagerly diversify their foreign exchange reserves with gold this year. As a result, investors are increasingly recognizing the true value of the precious metal. In an environment of uncertainty of a geopolitical nature and global crisis situations in the banking sector, the safe haven of gold is rightly attracting investors. The increasing shift away from the U.S. dollar should also strengthen the gold price. Just think of the emerging markets, which have debts in U.S. dollars and are not enthusiastic about a strong dollar. They'd rather turn away. All in all, gold investments are definitely part of investment considerations. Solid companies such as Gold Terra Resource and Revival Gold are good choices.
